Dreams Do Not Die With Defeat

I was super excited it was time to go. I already saw this car once but my dad needed to see it to make sure. I been looking for a car for about 5 month already and as an young boy i wanted something fast and i always had a fascination with the camaro especially the 2010-2015 line the fifth gen. I always wanted one black with a bright red strip right down the middle. But i found one not the same color i wanted but still beautiful but beastly all the same. It was red with a white stripe. Not no dark red either i am talking fire engine red. It was perfect and the price was even better for me. First test drive i took with my mom first time ever driving a sports car and it was amazing. Tried to convince my dad right then that i should sign of on it but he didnt go for it. Couple days later we go back to the dealership which is a about a 45 min ride so he can see this car and give it a once over(my dad is not a mechanic and know about zero on what this car should really look like) but he rides it and we take a lap and by the time i get back we r ready to sit down and sign the paperwork so i can drive this beauty home.

the dealer comes back with a worried face and said “the loan won't go through”

i answer “why not i know i have no credit so i have one of my parents cosign.”

“they are the problem. Your parents could not cosign because they are both cosigned on there cars they bought.”

I looked at her and just said “ok”

My parents felt terrible and what hit them harder was I wasn't upset. I got to feel my dream. It wasn't time yet to have that car. I did all research about it and mapped out my payments but it was a something I could not have seen coming so nothing to be upset about.
